Introduction

Since its inception, Cochrane has been overseen by a group of Trustees, reflecting the fact that its legal status is that of a UK charity and limited company. For the first 23 years of its existence, the organisation was led by a Steering Group made up of the Trustees. In the earliest years they had very significant operational responsibilities. When Cochrane employed a Chief Executive Officer and Editor-in-Chief, and as these individuals in turn recruited staff to help them discharge their responsibilities, there was less need for the Trustees to become engaged in operational matters.

In 2016 these changes were reflected in a change of name from Steering Group to Governing Board. This brought Cochrane into line with other major British charities, and emphasised the key role played by the Trustees in oversight and governance of the organization. At the same time, following best practice in the sector, a proportion of Trustees were recruited from outside Cochrane, to bring in the range of skills needed for the Board to fulfil its obligations.

In 2017 the Board further reflected on what type of Board it wanted to be. The Board considered the model of board engagement put forward by Nadler¹; this considers Board behaviour on a spectrum from 'passive' to 'operational'. Cochrane's Governing Board decided that it ought to sit in the middle of the spectrum; an engaged Board, committed to high performance rather than simply ensuring regulatory compliance.

Cochrane's Governing Board plays a key strategic role in the organisation and bears final responsibility for everything undertaken in Cochrane's name. In practical terms it oversees the performance of the Chief Executive Officer (CEO), Editor-in-Chief, their staff in the Central Executive Team and all those working for the wider organisation. It provides insight, advice and support for the CEO and the Senior Management Team (SMT), guiding them and holding them to account. It aims to 'add value' to the decision-making of the organisation, ensuring that at all times it has the expertise to do so. The Board, CEO and SMT discuss key decisions facing Cochrane in a collaborative way, seeking – together - to identify what is best for the organisation and specifically for the beneficiaries of the charity's activities. They have considered carefully – and continue to monitor - the boundaries of Board and CEO responsibilities.
